Here is the Church. Where is the Steeple?

In today's world, a church building may or may not have a steeple. In the past many churches included a steeple or bell tower in their design. By their nature, steeples and bell towers are tall and difficult to access.

Like all building components, maintenance of the steeple and bell tower is required to protect the structural integrity and keep them from becoming a safety hazard. Working "up high" is more difficult than working "off the ground" which makes maintenance expensive and dangerous.

Whether the design solution is tuck pointing or masonry, reinforcing the structure, refinishing the wood or removing the steeple from the church and installing a new roof at the opening, it requires a special contractor to complete the job. In business for 60 years, Bruns General is that contractor. Bruns has the equipment, knowledge and experience to remove, repair and maintain church steeples and bell towers.
